morning. The preponderance of buying as if the market would prove rather stubborn to further efforts to bring about orders indicated to some extent purchases as a hedge against calls sold by London privilege dealers.

Since the day brought no news developments of moment, and there were no indications of a revival of activity, a large number of professional traders in this market, as well as in London, squared accounts for the week, and arranged for a vacation until Monday, or until the reopening of the London market on Tuesday.

Droning out a quotation now and then, the tape indicated that most of the purchases were for the covering of short contracts and that the market was firm and strong in consequence of this covering.
